END.

I changed a bunch of things from my initial pencil version of the comic. Most of this was because I had started to gain a deeper understanding of the character as I continued to write about them. I changed Oaty's design to make it more distinct from Derry's. I added details like the word milk on the side of the van, moisturizer and tissues to Derry's bed, a photo of Oaty and AI together on Oaty's door. In my pens I wanted to add detail that established the world felt fully fleshed out and lived in. I completely changed the formatting of the scenes inside of the barn. I was already unhappy when I initially drew it. I felt like I had over explained rather than shown what was happening to Derry emotionally. I really enjoy my addition of his stress lines that visually connect his state of mind to him being the face of doom and destruction.

I think the biggest change I want to make with my story is giving it more space. I covered a lot of content and emotional beats. I think it could be better if I had more pages to give the reader more time to process what was happening. I am proud of how passively I worked on my comic, there was a crunch time, of course, but it wasn't as strained as it was in the past.
